Monthly commentary

After concerns emerged at the end of the summer, the macroeconomic indicators published in September tended to confirm the weakness of the US labour market. The data released for August showed a second consecutive monthly uptick of +0.1% in the unemployment rate (reaching 4.3%), a slowdown in wage growth (which nevertheless remains above inflation), and fewer job creations compared with the previous month. Although the deterioration remains relatively modest, this allowed the Fed to proceed with its first rate cut of the year (-25 bps), while slightly revising up its growth and inflation forecasts in light of robust consumption figures. The past month also saw a renewed burst of activity in the artificial intelligence ecosystem, with announcements including a massive $300 billion contract between Oracle and OpenAI for the provision of computing capacity, and a $5 billion investment by NVIDIA in Intel's capital.

This environment was particularly favourable for equity markets, which rose by +3.1% over the period (MSCI World €-hedged), with a clear outperformance of technology stocks (MSCI World Information Technology TR USD: +7.5%). Geographically, emerging markets posted the strongest gains (MSCI Emerging Markets Net TR USD: +7.1%), buoyed by lower US rates and the surge in Chinese technology names (MSCI China Tech Top 100 TR USD: +14.3%). Bond markets also delivered positive returns (Bloomberg Global Aggregate TR €-hedged: +0.5%), supported by a slight decline in interest rates in the United States (10-year: -8 bps) and in Europe (Germany 10-year: -1 bp), and by narrowing risk premia on corporate debt (OAS of EUR- and USD-denominated IG bonds: -8 bps and -7 bps, respectively).

In this context, the YCAP Tactical Investment fund advanced by +1.8%, versus +2.0% for its benchmark index*. Despite a higher exposure to equity markets (an average of 62% over the period), the performance was weighed down by negative selection effects mainly tied to the absence of exposure to Tesla (which jumped +33% over the month) and to the underperformance of S&P Global (-11%; 1.9% of the portfolio) and Salesforce (-8%; 1.8% of the portfolio), amid AI-related competitive concerns.
